Nicholas Mesarites visited the Church of the Holy Apostles in Constantinople around the year 1200 and left a description of the dome Pantocrator there, by the famous artist Eulalios. “His eyes are joyful and welcoming to those who are not reproached by their conscience, but to those who are condemned by their own judgment, they are wrathful and hostile...The right hand blesses those who follow a straight path, while it admonishes those who do not and, as it were, checks them and turns them back from their disorderly course. The left hand with its fingers spread far apart as possible, supports the Gospel.”
